

Introduction

As a SCUPI student, university life does not give me a completely new life. More accurately, it breaks some old rules and asks me to build my own rules. Through eight diary entries, I reflected on future technology, Hangzhou, self-awareness, campus pressure, happiness, peaceful moments, procrastination, and helping others. These topics look different, but they point to the same question: how can I keep inner tranquility when the environment changes quickly?

For me, wellness is not being happy all the time, and resilience is not pretending to be strong. Wellness means understanding my real needs; resilience means continuing to act under pressure without losing myself. This poster transforms my diary evidence into a concise visual narrative of personal growth, from roots and pressure to discipline and human connection.

*wellness is built by honest self-understanding;
resilience is built by repeated small actions.*

My Three Insights

- 1. Clear self-positioning
My future imagination and hometown memories show that I need roots as well as vision. AI may change the value of skills, while Hangzhou reminds me why I value innovation, independence, and original ideas.
- 2. Evidence-based resilience
College freedom is not automatically relaxing. It requires judgment and habits. Confidence should not come from empty self-comfort, but from evidence: previewing, reviewing, asking questions earlier, and starting difficult tasks for five minutes.
- 3. Shared wellness
Peace is often quiet, ordinary, and easy to miss. It appears after pressure is removed, during a bike ride, a meal with friends, or a careful conversation. Listening and active participation are small actions, but they help both myself and others.

References

Jeffery, D. M. (2015). Daoist Wisdom for Teachers: A Diary Study. University of Hawai'i Press

Jeffrey, D. M. (2021). Ancient Daoist wisdom and its associated principle of yin-yang for contemporary classrooms as foundations for a harmonious world, Journal of Philosophical Inquiry in Education, 28(3), 237-250.

Jeffery, D. M. (2010). A Teacher Diary Study to Apply Ancient Art of War Strategies to Professional Development, The International Journal of Learning, 17(3), 21-36

Future Application

- Stop making pressure worse through comparison and procrastination.
- Keep curiosity, but check the cost of habits.
- Build stronger routines: preview, review, ask earlier.
- Protect ordinary peaceful moments as recovery.
- Offer careful listening and active participation in group work.

Small actions repeated every day are stronger than one dramatic decision.